Despite seeing development in terms of infrastructure and vehicles in the oil rich districts of Sibsagar, Dibrugarh and Tinsukia in neighbouring Assam, the villagers of Nagaland seem unmoved over the lack of development in their own state.

The Wokha district in Nagaland, is a oil rich district but however development till date couldn't actually take place as a result of public protest and also protests by different organizations.

“The system of ownership over land and resources is different in Nagaland, and here its not owned by a single individual but by the community as a whole, and to do any activity such as oil exploration, the community as a whole must give the consent,” said Manisha Medhi, a research scholar based in Assam.

“Even the person beneath whose land the oil or any other natural resource is found doesn’t have the sole right or authority over the resource, but will rest on the entire community,” said Medhi.

Several senior residents of the Wokha district, when approached however said that they are happy with things as it is, and added that they are not much pained in seeing developments in the oil rich areas in the neighbouring state.

“There has been some development in areas such as Sibsagar in Assam, but it is not at all uniform and not decentralized. Only some selective people have gained, and most poor people basically the farmers, have suffered to a great extent,” said Nyanbemo Ngullie, a senior leader of the Lotha tribe, which is a strong force in Wokha where the oil fields are located.

The Lotha leader, who had once championed the fight against oil giants ONGC, said that he and everyone at Wokha is voicing for sustainable development to bring benefits for everyone.

“I have myself visited the developed districts in Assam and have witnessed the developmental scenario there. The benefits of the developmental activities have gone only to some individual and also to one section of the society, but overall we can’t call that development,” said Ngullie.

A study carried out under a media fellowship offered by the National Foundation for India (NFI) shows that though the Wokha district in Nagaland, and the Sibsagar, Dibrugarh and Tinsukia districts in Assam are oil rich, the people as a whole are yet to benefit from the natural resources.
